Although uterine involvement has been recognized in some posttransplant lymphoproliferative disorders (PTLDs), the incidence of PTLDs involving the uterus is rare. Most uterine PTLDs show a B-cell phenotype, and are observed in patients with solid organ transplants.

These B-cell PTLDs can mimic the etiology and presentation of myoma. We present a case of PTLD involving the uterus in a liver transplant patient who was diagnosed as having uterine myoma. CASE

REPORT {#s1} ===== A 43-year-old woman was admitted to our hospital complaining of abdominopelvic discomfort and oligomenorrhea, which had persisted for 3 months. No tumor, rheumatologic disease, or trauma was identified during the initial workup. She had undergone cadaveric liver transplantation 1 month previously for acute liver failure. Her postoperative course was complicated by spontaneous bacterial peritonitis, which was treated with triple antiobstructive therapy. Five weeks after transplantation, acute rejection and cyclosporine-induced nephrotoxicity were diagnosed; these were treated with pulse therapy with methylprednisolone and azathioprine. On admission, her general condition was stable. Physical examinations revealed a moderate amount of peritoneal effusion, a palpable left ovarian tumor, and a uterine myoma. No palpable lymph nodes were observed, and the liver was palpable. On imaging studies, the liver transplantation was evaluated as stable and no abnormal findings were found. A pelvic computed tomography (CT) scan revealed a heterogeneous cystic uterine myoma, without an ovarian tumor (Figure 1{ref-type="fig"}A). Pelvic ultrasonography showed a small, solid mass measuring 0.4 cm in the left ovary ([Figure 1](#F1
